RATIONALE

Many students find work in the area of applied anthropology, for example, in the native title, cultural heritage and development areas. It is important for students to have a sense of how anthropology works in real world applied contexts, and this course focuses on producing such an understanding.

SYNOPSIS

This course is designed to give undergraduate students an understanding of the contexts in which anthropological theories and methods are applied in Australia and overseas, grounding in the techniques of anthropological practice in these contexts, as well as an emergent sense of the issues and debates that surround and arise from the application of anthropological theories and methods. It is strongly recommended that all students who intend seeking employment (and therefore intend undertaking Honours) in Anthropology take this course.

On completion of this course students will have:

1. a good sense of the application of anthropology to specific areas of human life;
2. knowledge of some of the key theories of applied anthropology;
3. knowledge of some of the methods in and through which anthropology might be applied in context;
4. knowledge of some of the issues arising from the application of anthropology in certain contexts;
5. essay writing skills;

6. discussion skills gained from participation in tutorial/online situations;
7. critical response skills gained from tutorial/online participation;
