RATIONALE

Culture is a principal basis of identity. Individually, within groups, nationally and internationally, identity governs social interaction. Understanding how identity is assigned is a vital part of relating to culture and social organization. Consequently an understanding of culture and society is essential in an examination of cultural identity. To understand contemporary cultural identities, we must examine the historical influences that moulded current realities of particular groups and specifically for Australia, of our two Indigenous cultural groups - Australian Aboriginals and the Torres Strait Islanders. Both Aboriginals and Torres Strait Islanders developed differing cultures within their own groups. This course exposes the learner to parts of the histories of these peoples. Such knowledge contributes to an appreciation of Australia's Indigenous groups' identities with that of all communities and their relationships within multi-cultural Australia. The Australian identity begins with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander cultures: beliefs, histories, languages and lifestyles. Knowledge of culture and society will lead to an understanding of the diversity, complexity and richness of cultures from pre-history to present. Based on archaeological evidence and oral histories, this course investigates the realities of traditional Indigenous identity before and after the European invasion of Australia. The British annexation of this continent, beginning in 1788 and continuing over a period of more than two centuries, led to the subjugation of unique Indigenous Australian identities, replacing them with an identity based on British/European cultures and social structures. Subsequent immigration and the diversification of cultural composition have led to a diminution of national, notional and group identities. It is important to examine how Australians perceive national and group identities. Such notions of identity will affect the intercultural relationships in Australia's future.

SYNOPSIS

The content of this course explores concepts of Indigenous identity at a variety of levels: individual or personal identity, group identity, international perceptions of identity from indigenous and non-indigenous perspectives, an historical view of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander societies and identities, ideas of contemporary Australian identity, and a view to the future. During this course of study, learners will be introduced to: Cultural, social and environmental factors affecting personal and group identity, Events and concepts affecting notions of Australian identity, Indigenous social and cultural identities and how these have been affected by historical events, The effects of media and literature on development of views of Indigenous Australian identities, Possible futures in Australian notions of identity and inclusiveness.
