RATIONALE

One in five Australians experience changes in their mental health status at some point in time and especially at times of increased stress such as hospitalisation and family illness. A holistic approach is required wherever nurses are working to adequately care for a person's mental health. This includes working with individuals and groups of people who have a diagnosed mental illness, people suffering emotional distress as a result of increased stress, trauma, illness and/or hospitalisation, the families and loved ones of these people as well as the community in which they live. Effective, holistic practice develops as a result of the integration of a range of learning including knowledge about self, the context of nursing, and subject matter knowledge. Nurses with an understanding and appreciation of the complexity of mental health issues in different practice settings, establish a solid foundation for enhancing their capacity to be a registered nurse.

SYNOPSIS

This course enables students to acquire knowledge and to develop attitudes and skills relevant to a critical understanding of individuals and groups with mental health problems. Emphasis is placed on contemporary nursing and evidence based practice but students are expected to be able to evaluate current practices within an historical context. Several other themes are addressed in the course, including an ethical framework for decision-making and critical self-analysis to explore the concepts of prejudice and stigma. The students will explore the most common and pervasive mental illnesses burdening Australian society such as depression and suicide, substance-related disorders and anxiety. The nursing care of people with serious mental illness such as psychoses, affective disorders, thought disorders and eating disorders will be introduced. The mental health needs of special groups such as child and youth, older people, people from rural and isolated areas, Indigenous communities, Ethnic populations, the homeless and the incarcerated will also be addressed. The overall nursing care focus will be on understanding the experience of the person with the mental illness as well as the presenting condition. The clinical Course NUR2599 Clinical C: Nursing Care for Mental Health will provide opportunities for application of the theoretical material presented in this course.
