OTHER REQUISITES

It is recommended that students enrol in this course in the final semester of their degree.

RATIONALE

This course provides opportunities for students to reflect on and synthesise their learning in relation to their professional identities as contemporary educators. Students will draw on their learning in core courses and in their specialisation areas. They will develop deeper understandings of professional ethics, legal perspectives, local and global perspectives, the contexts and conditions framing pedagogies/andragogies and educators' life trajectories (in relation to educator identity/ies, professional and personal resilience and sustainability). Engaging in critical analysis of current contexts and conditions in education, emergent professionals will also be able to reflect on and articulate how their attitudes and views reflect the ethics of global citizens.

SYNOPSIS

Students enrolled in EDC4100 will engage with transformative pedagogies/andragogies in the context of contemporary case studies that reflect local, national and global issues in education. Students will develop workable responses to real world case studies and will be able to make connection to personal and collective efficacy. This will draw on the prior learning and experiences that inform their personalised frameworks of practice that delineate the roles and responsibilities of educators as global citizens and contemporary educators. Emergent professionals will be able to make connections between theory and practice and the professional standards for educators (QCT, EQ, national and/or global as appropriate) and will document these connections through a personalised e-portfolio. They will also identify future learning goals that will support their professional identities, resilience and sustainability in complex and fluid educational contexts. NOTE: Minimum enrolment numbers apply to this offering. Should enrolments not reach the minimum number required for on-campus study, students may be transferred to the EXT or WEB offering and advised of this change before semester commences.
