RATIONALE

As a multicultural society with a predominantly European tradition, Australia is currently challenged to re-assess and re-define its regional identity globally and in Asia and the Pacific, and to become more sensitive to the cultures and aspirations of their own and other societies. This course has been designed to enhance individuals' capacities to assume informed and responsible roles in their social and professional lives in Australia and in the wider world. It does so in terms of further developing students' academic and professional skills using relevant theoretical perspectives of International Relations through the application of effective analytical and communicative skills.

SYNOPSIS

Drawing upon frameworks from the discipline of International Relations, the course provides information about, and analysis of, contemporary issues, international relationships and cross-cultural processes. It emphasises the main themes of "globality", "glocality" and "human security". The evolution of the "Australia experience" and Australians' evolving perceptions, roles, values, and impacts on, primarily, the Asia-Pacific region and of peoples of the Asia-Pacific in Australia, will be examined. Particular attention will be given to the personal and social concerns and skills of students that will enhance their role as competent citizens, workers and family members and facilitate Australia's role in the region.

OBJECTIVES

On completion of this course students will be able to:

1. describe and assess the main geographical, historical and cultural features of the "Australian experience", and contrast that experience with those in the Asia-Pacific region;

2. identify and analyse the growth and dimensions of Australian involvement in global affairs and relationships with the peoples and states of the Asia-Pacific region in particular;
3. identify and analyse the major issues which have dominated Australia's relationships with the Asia-Pacific;
4. demonstrate cultural literacy skills through their comprehension and analysis of the cultural traditions of the Asia-Pacific;
5. academic and professional skills by critiquing an assigned article;
6. written and oral communication that conforms to the discipline by presenting an oral presentation on an assigned reading, and preparing and submitting a written article critique and major essay;
7. ethical research and inquiry skills by comprehending and applying basic referencing norms and practices in their work;
8. comprehension of the currency and relevancy of International Relations to their career interests and to the broader community within which they will function as informed citizens.
