DOING RESEARCH WITH ABORIGINAL PEOPLE

Find out about grass roots research from Aboriginal researchers and people doing research in Aboriginal communities.

All research projects tend to go through certain phases. This seminar will explore ways that these phases can be worked through so as to ensure the goals of Aboriginal communities are met in the process.

Researchers will share their experiences and seek advice and input from those attending. It is hoped this day can facilitate the development of research interest networks and future research.

Special Keynote Address: Prof John Lowe, RN, PhD.

Professor John Lowe's contributions to the nursing profession are heavily based in his research program, which has evolved from his doctoral dissertation, "Cherokee Self-Reliance", which investigated cultural values that contribute to the Cherokee Nation's health and well-being, particularly in regards to substance use and abuse.

He has developed and published "A Cherokee Nation's Prevention and Therapeutic Management Self-Reliance Model," that was conceptualized during his dissertation work.
