SYNOPSIS

This course introduces students to the basic institutions and processes of government and the economy. While the course has broad application it examines institutions within a regional framework using examples from Australia and Asia where appropriate. Sovereignty of the domestic institutions of government and the economy is examined as international institutions become prominent as coordinators of national activity. Australian political and economic institutions are analysed as exemplars of the roles of institutions in a regional economy. Domestic, political and economic institutions are compared and examined within an international context. Political and Economic Institutions consists of core modules and two module streams. Students may select a module set (modules 5, 6 and 7) that suits their particular interests or study requirements.

OBJECTIVES

NOTE. The course objectives apply to both the Political Institutions and Economic Institutions streams of study. Although assessment expectations differ between streams, students may attempt assignment and examination questions from either stream. For the 2004 offering of this course, alternative political and economic streams will not be offered. In 2004 the primary focus of the course will be political in nature and the assessment requirements will reflect this. On completion of this course students will be able to:

1. explain the nature of the international and regional political and economic environment that bears upon political and economic institutions;
2. have an informed understanding of the structure, roles and activities of political and economic institutions within countries that comprise the Asian regional economy;
3. broadly explain the history of Australian and Asian regional, political and economic institutional development in the period following 1945;
4. have the capacity to appreciate and evaluate political and economic institutions and phenomena in an analytical manner;
5. critique the development of theory with respect to economic and/or political institutions;
6. present rational, well-researched, written arguments about political and economic institutions with clarity and coherence; and
7. understand the nature of significant political and economic concepts as they apply to institutions in Australia, Asia and other countries.
